GOULD 18—WILTON 0

In a game that was closer than the score indicated Gould Academy defeated Wilton 18-0, thus maintaining its record of never being beaten by the up-state Academy. The game was featured by a 65 yard touchdown jaunt by Captain Buddy Clough and a 70 yard punt by Tucker, which turned into the setup for the second touchdown after Palmer viciously tackled the safety man just as he picked up the ball. Palmer's tackle was so hard it knocked the ball out of his hands to be recovered by Gould on the six yard line.

Wilton was anything but a "set-up" as they featured long runs by Brooks and the Durrell brothers. They completed six passes in 18 attempts and coupled with some brilliant runs chalked up 12 first downs. The Gould defense however, had what it takes when the goal line was threatened.

The entire Gould team showed considerable improvement. The work of the ends, for the greater part of the game, was exceptionally good. However, from tackle to tackle there is still room for improvement. Tackling in the open field was still ragged but the team bolstered itself in the pinches, which proved good enough to hold Wilton scoreless.

The "Blue and Gold" play their final game of the season a week from Saturday, entertaining Berlin, N. H., on the Alumni Field.

The truck, which belonged to Leslie Davis, was carrying lumber from the Davis mill on the shore of Umbagog Lake in Cambridge to Bethel. As it neared the foot of the hill it went out of control and turned over several times.

After the accident Parsons walked a quarter of a mile or more to the home of Leon Enman and called Mr. Davis. He was taken to the St. Louis Hospital at Berlin and after treatment returned to his home in town. Besides the broken bones he received cuts and bruises. The truck was demolished.

UNTO ONE OF THE LEAST OF THESE—AN APPEAL

The Gospel of St. Matthew promises that in the final reckoning the King shall award the kingdom to the people on his right hand for their benevolences to Him. In surprise these folk will ask when they had befriended Him and the answer shall be "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren ye have done it unto Me."

Last year the women of the local American Legion Auxiliary donated warm clothing and shoes to 45 needy children in and around Bethel.

This season their good work has already begun. Three newborn babies have been provided with clothing and blankets. A few days before the opening of school these welfare workers learned of two families of children with no suitable school clothes and they promptly assembled and supplied outfits for 11 grateful youngsters.

More second-hand clothing is needed, material for layettes is hoped for, money from a small local fund has been promised to repair donated shoes and overshoes and garments of all kinds that can be made over are usable.

This active charity is made possible by the work of the Auxiliary women and the generosity of the townspeople. In this appeal the Auxiliary wishes to express their thanks for the support they have received and solicit further cooperation. Remember that any clothing, footwear, bedding or toys is usable and acceptable. Mrs. Henry Bennett is chairman of the welfare work.

Miss Katherine Dallery returned to her home at Canton Monday.

BETHEL TEACHERS INJURED—WHEN CAR SKIDS

While on their way to the State Teachers' Convention at Lewiston this morning the car carrying the Bethel primary school teachers skidded near the Penney filling station and was badly damaged. It is reported that Mrs. Ethel Bisbee was uninjured, but the other three occupants, Miss Maxine Clough, Mrs. Dorothy Tucker, and Miss Alice Ballard, though not seriously injured, were taken to a Lewiston hospital.

SOUTH PARIS WINS OVER GOULD 15-7

Gould Academy and South Paris High staged another close hard fought game in which the visitors displayed the greater scoring punch near the goal line. Gould opened by running the kick-off to the 39-yard line and then marched steadily to the 12-yard line to have their fine offensive play suddenly fizzle out. Could they have continued on for a touchdown the game may have been another story.

However, South Paris came right back with another long march, greater than Gould's, and their attack proved adequate to continue through to a touchdown. Libby ran the extra point to leave the score 7-0 for Paris at the half.

In the third period an intercepted Gould pass ran back 45 yards gave the visitors another scoring set-up which they took advantage of to shove over their final counter.

In the last period the local eleven opened up with passes, coupled with a revived running attack, pushed over a touchdown. Clough crossed the double line on a line buck and they place-kicked the extra point.

For the losers Clough played excellent ball on both offense and defense, while Palmer snared one pass and was a tower of strength on the left side of the line. The Gould team as a whole played improved ball or they would have taken a much worse beating from the visitors who were a fast, hard-hitting club. Libby and Durgin were spark plugs for the winners.

40 YEARS AGO In the NEWS
October 25, 1899

The presses of the News Publishing Co. are run by a 3 h. p. water motor and early in the fall this company began to consider the advisability of putting in a small dynamo to light the News office, and from this has grown the plan that is now in operation to light the stores in the vicinity of said office. A No. 16 Belknap water motor will furnish sufficient power to furnish the desired number of lights.

West Bethel—Between 20 and 30 of the late A. S. Bean's heavy work horses were sold last week and taken to Grovelton, N. H., on cars.

We understand that Rev. Arthur Varley is done preaching here, but Rev. Mr. Barton will be with us on the first and third Sundays of each month and the Sunday School will be continued.

"THEY TELL ME"

Well I have always heard of folks being so close to the woods they couldn't see the trees, or something like that. And now it seems to me that most of the folks in this U. S. are in this fix. You know the last two months we have all got the idea that if we don't look out we will be mixed up in the fight over across, such as it is.
And even Congress was called to decide how we could make money and keep out of it. Now of course if there's a fight anywhere, and there usually is, a lot of good Americans kind of specialize on supplying the equipment that goes why our facilities for helping other fight should be so important and awful popular is still beyond me.
For some years since the other war was called off in 1918, the practical folks over in Europe had been trying to build up a good solid trade with other countries.
And being rather smarter than we are they were going along pretty smooth. They had to hurry, of course, because there is only about so much time between fights over there anyway. Now the scrimmage has started their export trade has gone to smash and if we are half bright we will get a hustle on and on after their unfinished business.
There are still a lot of places to look for trade besides in little Europe and we ought to be able to flicker so that both us and our customers could make a good bargain.

The SNAPSHOT GUILD
HALLOWE'EN PICTURES

A box-camera could get this, with high speed film, one small "hood" bulb inside pumpkin, snapshot exposure. Try some like it this Halloween!

HALLOWE'EN, with its parties, decorations, and grotesque masquerades, offers fine opportunity for weird, unusual pictures. And these are easy—it's mostly just a matter of placing your photo bulbs to obtain a novel lighting effect.

Ordinarily, photo bulbs are placed at the subject's eye level, or above.
But for weird effects, you place them low—so that the light shines upward into the subject's face. It's a simple trick, but it produces surprising results.

Try this idea in a jack-o'-lantern shot, such as the one above. Use just one small No. 1 flood bulb inside the pumpkin, at a distance of two feet from the subject's face. For box cameras load with high speed film, of course, and open to the large-est lens aperture. For finer cameras and high speed film, set the shutter for 1/25 second and lens aperture at f/11. Incidentally, see that the

interior of the pumpkin, nor shine directly into the camera lens (via Jack's nose or eyes).

Use the same idea for a picture of the "witch's cauldron" at the Hallowe'een party. Simply place the light down in the kettle—allowing it to shine up in the "witch's" face.
Also, get a shot of a group listening to a ghost story. For this one, place photo lights at floor level, or conceal them back in the fireplace, to imitate firelight. You'll need two bulbs for this shot, and exposure data will be found in any snapshot-at-night leaflet, which you can get without charge from your photographic dealer.

It's fun to play with these effects, but don't overlook other Halloween activities. Get shots of the games
... ducking for apples ... costumes and masks ... serving of refreshments. Make the party record complete, and then you can enjoy it over and over again.

ANNUAL MEETING OF OXFORD COUNTY FARM BUREAU NOV. 1

Mrs. Ruth Elliott of Gorham and Maurice D. Jones, Professor of Farm Management at the University of Maine, will be the main speakers at the annual meeting of the Oxford County Farm Bureau on Wednesday, Nov. 1. The meeting will be at South Paris in Association Hall and President Edmund Smith of Bethel will open with an address of welcome at 1.30. Exhibits will be on display for inspection before the meeting and during the noon hour.

Mrs. Elliott will tell about her trip to London last summer, when she represented Maine at a conference of the Associated Country Women of the World. The subject of Professor Jones' address will be "The Effect of the War on Agriculture." Those who attended the annual meeting last year will, no doubt, be glad to know that arrangements have been made to have amplifiers in the hall so everyone will be able to hear with ease.

Two local people will tell how they have used Extension projects to good advantage. Mrs. Charlotte Fillebrown, Waterford, has remodeled her kitchen and is going to explain what improvements she made and how it serves her needs better than before. One of the Thurston Brothers in Norway is going to tell how they get good pasture during the entire season and how supplemental crops fit into the picture.

The program will also include musical selections; an explanation of soil erosion by William B. Oliver, state coordinator of the Soil Conservation Service; election of the 1940 Executive Committee, and a final report of the membership campaign contest by the captains, Bob Hastings and Ada Brooks.

Dinner will be served at noon by several local organizations so everyone will be assured of prompt service.

COST OF A WAR

In view of the fact that many groups in this country—industry, retailers, farm organizations, labor, and various others—have come out with strong stands against this country's participation in war, it is important at this time to see just what lies behind their aversion from a realistic point of view.

Evidences continue to pile up that the opposition in America to the idea of war is based, more than anything else, on the rack and ruin that war causes along all fronts.

What were some of the costs of the last war? It may help to avoid ever entering another one to have these matters brought clearly to light.

Here is at least part of the sad story:

To pay for our actual participation cost this country 22 billion dollars Loans to our allies, largely unpaid, ran to more than eight billions more. That's a direct cost of 20 billions, then, paid mostly in the productive wealth of our factories, our retailing, our farming, and the hard work of Americans in every branch of productive enterprise.

What's more, it's only the beginning. It takes no account of demobilization and dozens of other items that followed the war. Total veterans expenditures to date, for instance, have come to nearly 12 billion dollars more. Whereas back in 1916 the United States was paying about $4,000,000 on the veterans' institutions, today it is spending over $50,000,000.

To make the picture even worse, these direct costs hardly begin to account for the burden a war imposes. It takes no account at all of the losses that come directly to industry, on whose welfare the prosperity of the nation depends, from the dislocation of an entire economy from idle factories, idle men, and idle investments. The inevitable aftermath of war. As one authority well puts it, "The calculation of war cost there is literally no end."

No wonder all those productive groups in this country who help to create the wealth that is poured down the drain of war want only peace!

TRUTH about ADVERTISING

By CHARLES B. ROTH

TRADE MARKS AND DOLLAR MARKS

WITHOUT giving the matter much thought you might define a trade mark on a package or an advertisement as a mark of identification which protects the interest of the seller against imitators; a selfish symbol, you know, which exists to help some one man or firm to get rich.

Actually a trade mark is as much to your interest as it is to the man who owns it and has it registered in his name.

For it is a buying guide for you which you can absolutely trust. You can buy anything under a trade mark and know that the quality, the quantity and the price will be right. You do not even have to examine the package before you buy. If the trade mark is there, so also will the quality be there.

The merchant knows that. He prefers to sell trade-marked, that is, advertised, goods, because they have the confidence of the public and can be sold easily, quickly and in quantity.

Back of the trade mark is advertising. It stands for the trade mark, for the trade mark itself is merely a design etched on paper, until advertising gives it life in the minds of consumers like yourself.

The trade mark which saves you money and time need not be a formal design of a national manufacturer or advertiser. It may be merely the familiar name of your grocer or haberdasher, appearing at the foot of his advertisements in the newspaper.

Wherever you see those familiar words or names or marks you know that you are in the presence of a man who is doing his level best to be worthy of your trade and who wants to keep you coming back.

He is advertising for that purpose, notifying you that he is in business to stay and that you can buy from him and he will stand back of his goods. For you the trade mark, like the dollar mark which we all respect, stands for full value wherever it happens to be found.

But unidentified goods are as uncertain as counterfeit money, and the wise man or woman avoids both.

And how close these trade marks are to our lives and how comforting they are to us when we buy! You go into a store. On the shelves are familiar marks you have seen all your life.

You recognize them as you do familiar faces in a strange crowd—and they give you the same comforting feeling of familiarity and respect.

Trade marks exist to help you buy more serenely and profitably.

THE STORY

CHAPTER I—On board the Nord-Express, bound for Ostend, Dr. David Jebb is seated for America. With him is five-year-old Cynthia Thatcher, his temporary ward. On the train they meet Bill Coleman, former classmate of David's. David tells Coleman of his mission, and of his one unconquerable vice—an overwhelming desire for liquor. Jebb feels that he is coming to him again, and wants to safeguard the child, whose father is dead and whose mother awaits her coming in the United States.

CHAPTER II—David receives a minor injury while on the train, and a sympathetic passenger pours brandy down his throat. That is sufficient to kindle the same old desire for liquor. Jebb takes the child with him, leaves the train, and begins drinking. Bill Coleman, the old acquaintance, remains on board the train.

CHAPTER III—A strange incantation wakes Jebb from a dull stupor. His brain is in a fog, he looks around, seeing a strange woman, dressed in flowing robes and heavily veiled. In broken English she tells him he is in Istanbul, that her name is Miruma, and that she will take care of him. She had not seen Cynthia, who is missing. Later Miruma tells him she is the wife of a Pasha, but wife in name only. The Pasha has another wife—a true wife whom he loves dearly. Miruma means nothing to the Pasha. Finding Jebb in a stupor, she tells him of a powerful man in Istanbul, Akel Bey, whose son is slowly dying.

CHAPTER IV—Jebb moves to a hotel, seeking the lost Cynthia. He makes no progress. He goes to call at the house of Akel Bey, operates on his son, and saves the boy's life, thus earning the family's deep gratitude.

CHAPTER V

When Jebb had carried the young Bey sufficiently past the shoals to intrust him to the care of his mother, he went back to the Hotel Turati to wait until it was safe for him to leave town. He was immediately besieged with petitions of every sort, from the poor folk who begged him to prescribe for the cough of his sick buffalo, to the British consul who sent for him on his own account.

Meanwhile, McCloud had received a telegram from the Austrian Consul at Constantinople, asking him to locate the child.

And now Jebb began to wonder if he might not have lost the child in some other city. Salim was a long journey from his last definite memory of Constantinople, and there were various ways of reaching there.

On the third day of Gani Bey's convalescence, a servant brought to his room a request that he grant an audience to Fehim Pasha, Miruma's husband.

The name set Jebb's nerves a-tingle, and he stammered as he told the servant to bring the Pasha up.

He determined to make a brave front and, taking a hasty glance at his Turkish grammar, found the phrase for "Come in, sir, and sit down."

This delighted the Pasha and he launched forth into a stream of Turkish. The flood carried away all of Jebb's little phrases and he could not even remember how to say that he did not speak Turkish.

The Pasha showed his disappointment at the check, thought a while, then ventured in bad French:

"Die parle francais son peu. Est-ce que moosoo le parle?"

And Jebb answered in worse:

"Ung poo."

Proceeding then with much caution yet with far more mangling of French grammar than Jebb realized, the Pasha explained that he had heard of Jebb's great success. His friend, Akel Bey, had told him what marvels the Jewish Jebb Effendi had wrought upon his son, and Gani Bey's mother had visited the Pasha's wife in her sick room to advise her to call him in at once, for the Pasha's wife was very ill—if Jebb Effendi would pardon a gentleman for mentioning his wife to another gentleman! She was wasting time and no one seemed to know what or where or whence, her husband was. Perhaps—undoubtedly—Jebb Effendi would know at a glance.

Jebb was so relieved at the nature of the Pasha's visit that he consented to go at once.

Nahir Hanim was plainly suffering a mortal illness, Jebb's eyes told him that.

He found her temperature high, and her breathing fast and weak, her general condition alarming. It was important that he should know everything and have his wits about him. The struggle to torture his own thoughts into French; then to translate back into English what the sick woman whispered was too baffling and irritating to be endured.

He gave up and went back to the hall where the Pasha waited anxiously. His French was almost too lame to express its own lameness, but he managed to make clear his need of an interpreter. The Pasha exclaimed:

"If only my other wife were here. She understands English."

"Your other wife?" Jebb echoed.

"Yes," said the Pasha, apologetically, "it is my misfortune to have two wives, Moosoo Jebb. I will send for the other at once. Perhaps she can repay me now in part for the enormous expense she has put me to."

He clapped his hands. A servant appeared, whom he dispatched for his coachman. When this man arrived he was dispatched post haste to request Miruma Hanim to come at once.

"The possession of two wives, moosoo," said the Pasha, "was not my wish but my misfortune. Few Turks except the rich and dissolute have endeavored to keep more than one wife. The law permits us four, but the law does not furnish us with funds, and the prophet did not advise it. And it were easier to keep four tigresses in a cage, Moosoo Jebb, than four wives in a house. For Turkish women are tyrannical, moosoo, and very exacting."

"I was content with one wife. Nahir Hanim is a good woman, she has borne me many children—why should I have desired another wife? I did not. But his Imperial Majesty, the Padishah, our benefactor and enlightened master—whom Allah preserve!—in those beautiful days when I enjoyed his favor, felt graciously inclined to present me with another. My own wife—she is a noble woman, moosoo, but jealous—she threatened to destroy herself if I made the other woman, this Miruma, my real wife. I went through the ceremony, but only the ceremony. Miruma Hanim is beautiful, I am told, but I have never seen her without her veil."

"If you should grant your second wife a release she would no longer be an—an expense to you."

"The release is itself a great expense," said the Pasha, thinking hard, "I could not dismiss her without providing for her future or repaying the money I received from the Padishah as her dowry."

"Why not repay it?"

"You surgeons speak easily of amputations."

Though he could not understand the elaborate Turkish of the Pasha's greeting to Miruma, Jebb could see the mingled constraint and curiosity of his manner. There was something of the aged bridegroom in his cordiality as he seemed to try to peer through the yashmak of the woman who had been his Yes-and-No wife for years. There was something of the faithful husband, too, in his formal courtesy, for Nahir Hanim was lying in the next room and weeping weakly, a sick woman in great dismay.

The Pasha received Miruma's homage with a poor attempt at lofty majesty. Then he remembered Jebb, and spoke of him in Turkish with an evident flourish in his praise. Miruma, thus licensed, turned her eyes full upon him and the Pasha made the presentation in his best French.

Jebb bowed. Miruma lifted imaginary dust and placed it on her breast, her lips, and her brows. Then the Pasha raised the portiere to his wife's room and Miruma went in, trembling with fear and bowing with all the deference required of a second wife before the Bash-Kadin.

A little later Jebb was summoned. The Pasha spoke again to Miruma, evidently counseling her to talk freely to the American surgeon. Then he bowed himself out of the haremlik, leaving the foreign wife and the foreign doctor with their helpless victim.

Tortured with her own impossible position, Miruma turned to Jebb with a halting:

"What, please, am I to say or do, Jebb Effendi?"

"If you will ask her my questions, and tell me her answers—please—hanim effendim—madame. Ask her where her pain is greatest."

Miruma put the question in Turkish of evident circumlocution. For answer Nahir's pale hand crept up and rested over her heart.

"Ask her how long she has been ill."

"She says she is seck for very, very long times. She have great fever in the night. In the morning she is better, but not well; in the morning she can eat some little, but later nothing at all."

Jebb had noted that Nahir was breathing very rapidly, or rather panting than breathing, for her respiration was exaggerated and shallow. He placed his hands at her sides, squeezed the chest walls. Nahir gave a little cry of pain.

And now with keener scrutiny he desisted below her left breast a slight distension of the flesh, not in outline but faintly in perspective.

His first gasp of delight at his discovery was quenched in a realization of its vital import.

"You have found the evil, Jebb Effendi?" said Miruma eagerly.

"You have found the evil, Jebb Effendi?"

"I think so, madame, but I must make sure. If I only had an anæsthetic! I don't suppose I could get one in Istanbul." He thought hard, then he said, "This hypodermic needle is large; it will have to do."

He darted from the room and ran downstairs, followed by the astounded Pasha. The old coffee-maker, as he expected, had a vessel of boiling water on the coals. Without further ado, Jebb dropped the hypodermic needle in and stirred the charcoal. When the instrument had boiled long enough to suit him, he fished it out and hurried upstairs again.

When Jebb approached Nahir Hanim again and poised the needle over her heart, she thrust his hand aside with feeble haste and a little wall of fright. Even Miruma was afraid and interceded:

"Please not to hurt the poor lady!"

Jebb answered, "She is too ill to feel it much—but you needn't tell her so. Just tell her I shall not give her much pain, and that it is necessary for me to find out what causes this condition."

Though Miruma sought to reassure Nahir Hanim, she yielded rather from inability to resist than from conviction.

And so at last, with Miruma holding the trembling hands of the panic-stricken Nahir, Jebb placed the point of the needle against the white skin, at the fifth intercostal space, set his thumb along the needle as a check, and pressed it backward, inward, and downward, with the utmost nicety, avoiding bone, and artery, and cartilage, and throbbing heart.

Nahir Hanim quivered with a twinge of pain, but she watched Jebb's eyes. She saw his intense frown dissolve in an arch of exultance, of that exultance surgeons feel on tracking a hidden trouble home. When he lifted away the needle, the cylinder was filled with an evil fluid.

He nodded his head and again he became very solemn.

"What does eet, effendim?" Miruma whispered.

"Come with me to the Pasha, madame."

He turned to nod and smile as reassuringly as he could to the anxious patient, and went into the hall where the Pasha rose to his feet with many questions. Miruma translated:

"Pasha Effendi weesh to know do you know what eet ees?"

Jebb answered: "Empyema of the pericardium."

Miruma threw up her hands in dismay. The Pasha nagged her to translate, but she could not. Jebb tried to describe what he meant.

"The heart—you understand, the heart?"

"Ah, yes—yes—geonul."

"The heart hangs in a kind of a sack called the pericardium. It has a little fluid to lubricate it, but the pericardium of Madame Nahir is not well. It is filled with thick liquid like this in the tube. And her heart must beat through it like a man wading through heavy snow. It grows wearier and weaker. It cannot beat much longer. Tell him."

The brows of Miruma were beautiful with pity for the old Pasha, and she told him as gently as if he were a child.

He plucked his beard in mourning and sent his lean fingers to and fro among his beads.

Miruma turned to Jebb:

"Ees eet no hope of to save her? Must she—must she—dreenk of the Cup?"

Jebb answered: "I think I can save her. I think—I hope—I believe so. If I operate there 's at least a chance for her. It is a very hard operation. But without it there is no chance. One cannot always be sure of a diagnosis, but here I am sure. I know; I can see. If the pericardium is not opened and drained at once, she will die, and die soon. If I am given freedom to act, I can save her—I think. I am almost sure."

Miruma translated the message of hope with a hint of enthusiasm that raised the Pasha from the cold ashes of despair. At length the Pasha took the leap, commended his beloved to the good hands of Allah and the skill of the Amerigali.

Jebb was more alarmed than he dared admit. He felt the need of skilled help. He could think of no one but Miruma to hold the instruments and hand them to him as they were needed.

After the deed should be done, a trained nurse was sadly to be desired. Lacking such an aide, he turned to Miruma.

"I need someone to care for Nahir Hanim afterward—to help me. Will you?"

Miruma did not trust herself to speak. She nodded.

"And now I must find Mirison. Explain it to the Pasha, please—madame."

All he saw of her face was her eyes. They were enough. They widened and deepened with understanding of an inner meaning he had hardly realized himself till the moment. In a seizure of confusion he dashed from the house.

WHAT DO YOU DO WITH YOUR Worn-out Cows?
Sure, cows wear out when you keep them producing heavily and bearing calves unless you assure them the necessary elements which may be lacking in their everyday feed. Give them Watkins Mineralized Stock Tonic and they will be sure of those minerals as well as tonics and regulators to help keep them in top condition.
